MEDICINAL.

FOR BLOOD----AND SKIN!

A. B. C. Chemical Co., Richmond, Fa.:

Having for a long time suffered from the effects of a horrible blood trouble, and after resorting to medical skill and other remedies without bene-fit, I tried "A. B. C. Alterative." I have been entirely restored, and it affords me pleasure to attest its virtues. It is evidently a very great tonic and alterative, and I recommend any suffering from blood trouble, to try it.

For some time the old man sat out against the horizon on the rickety old worm fance, thinking so intently that he had not spoken; but now he seemed to suddenly remember something, and looking up, said :

"Hey you never heard o' the ghos' o Greenway?"

Yes, we had, but this inquiry was exciting, for we were now within three miles of that historic old court. And though we knew it perfectly well, we listened while

Over to the west at sundown on that same day, we drew rein before the site of the present "Greenway Court."

The speaker sat on the door of an old stone building whose quaint architecture and mouldering walls bespoke the use of many

It was just sunset, and as the last rays of light fell and died on the face of this old "uncanny" negress, puffing away at her pipe and dreaming over the scenes of brighter and happier days, we found it not hard to believe her story. Indeed, we fancied as we stood there and night gathered so quick ly around us, that through the window we could see the old man sitting at his desk and writing, for this was the office used by that remarkable old gentleman, Thomas, that remarkable old gentleman, Thomas, Lord Fairfax, Baron of Cameron.

I shall not attempt to tall you the character of this old royalist; he is well-known as the tall gaunt gentleman, with his bursts of wit and humor, his spells of melancholy, as a stern old king-lover, the friend indeed and in need of the poor young Addison, and the former preceptor of Washington, whom he employed in his youth to survey Steam Flooring & Planing Mill whom he employed in his youth to survey the immense tract of five million seres of land in this pleasant Valley of Virginia.

We promised the old darkey, after listen-ing some time to her strange mutterings, that we would likely come again after tea and go with her to the fields (for she ineisted that was necessary) to see the ghost of old Lord Fairfax.

Here, at about a mile from the present vil-age of White Post, he built the great broad-abled Lodge, and calling it "Greenway luge of gabled Lodge, and calling it "Greenway Court," passed the remaining days of his lonely life. He always lived a bachelor and cared little, they say, for the society of the fair sex, trying hard by a life of activity and revelry and seclusion to kill the memories of the unrequited love of his youth; yet en-deavor as he would, there were moments when the old love would triumph, and it was in an hour of this kind when the old fellow returned one evening from Wincher ter, 12 miles away (where he also had an of-fice), to look, as it afterwards proved, for the last time upon the scenes at "Greenway

On this evening, at about dusk, he walk ed down over the dewy lawn to the corner of the yard and there knelt beneath the tall cedars and wept for a long hour, muttering brokenly the name of his only love of long ago. Then returned to the house, restless beneath those floods of remorse and disap-pointment, mounted his horse and rode to Winchester, from whence he never return-

There occurred, a few days afterward, that pathetic scene between him and his faithful servant, when, sick in heart and body, he heard the exulting populace shoutin the street over the name of the surrender of the English armies, and exclaimed: "Take me to bed, Joe, it is time for me to die," and passed away. That Washington, the curly haired boy who had sported over his lawn here at Greenway, had led the Americans to a final victory over the English and their king was too much for the old royalist. It was indeed time for him to

In a secluded part of the old burying ground at Winchester, a simple slab marks the place where he rests, alone.

The cows stood silent in the barn-yard awaiting the hour when they were to be again set free. The last faint glimpse of day was dying on the Virginia hills. We stood there, at the appointed hour, nervously awaiting the movements of the negress who was stirring about in the dairy beneath the hill. Wandering near old places of this was surring about in the dairy beneat the hill. Wandering near old places of this kind, a certain feeling of awe and unrest overtakes you, and try as you will to suppress them, the chills will creep up the back, and unconsciously, mechanically you look behind you.

As we stood there in the twilight, with the great tail trembling shades hovering over the old court in a veil of mystery and darkness, with the village bells a mile away tolling faintly on the quiet air, we thought and felt that it would not be a difficult matter to see the little old lord, periwigged and beruilled, without the aid of the old darkey. Not a sound was stirring now. We were growing very uncomfortable wondering why the old woman did not come.

Presently we heard the great burnyard gate creak on its rusty hinges, and though we could distinguish nothing but a shad-ow moving, we felt sure she had come at the winding lane for balf a mile they went. Now they were safe in the field and we turned about to retrace our steps, starting and trembling at bushes and stones along the road, and wondering why we were com pelled to take this gloomy wark in order to see the ghost of the old lord.

A strange procession we made, with the old carkey bobbling along with her glowing pipe, muttering and mumbling idiot-like—saying scarce a word distinctly. Every moment now was intense with excitement. We were nearing the old yard. A public that the contraction is a second of the contraction of the breeze floated by us from the lilar bushes in the garden. And then we discerned the

Then came so awful pause

I looked, and there in the long rush grass knelt a white figure. It was the old royal-ist, and though the night was very dark I thought I could see the pain in his face as he lifted it to the stars and groaned. A mo ment more and the shadow was gone, the tall pines sighed more lonely in the wind as we harried along the fence to where we first saw the old negress, glad once more to reach a buman babitation.

Possibly every one can recall some such a scene as when we gathered around the great fire-place in the dingy old ruln of a room, with no light save that from a few flickering coals on the hearth—the remnant of the suppor fire—and listened to the old woman rehearsing again her many experiences with the "ghos" of the sad Englishmen. Several years, now, have passed since that night, and "Greenway" to day exists only in the memories of the old folks. The old stone office is still standing, and still used by the the told us all about it, but it took an hour. It was then high noon, and throwing upward a glance at the sun, he reckoned "it wur moe' time fer dinner," and then passed away after having duly invited us.

A new house is erected upon the site of the old one, and as we stood there that moreing beneath the giant shades, the busy rattle of the great lumbering road-wagon, the clatter and cackle of the poultry-yard, the rum bling of the passing train beneath the hill, bursts of song among the trees, and the high sun of noon thining strongly overhead—all suggested the idea that "Greenway court" had long, long been sleeping, and would know no awakening. And looking down toward the corn r of the yard as we rode away, we seemed to hear-not the groan of the old lord-but the hollow croaking of our old negro friend; and suddenly it grew dark and we were standing shivering again be fore her at the old office door and heard the
